Wrapping Up

Foreword

Reality is the beginning precept of personal growth. We mainly grow as humans by discovering new realities about ourselves and our world. You'll surely learn some crucial lessons regardless how you live, but you are able to speed up your growth hugely by consciously looking for truth and intentionally rejecting untruth and denial.

Actual personal growth is truthful growth. You can't make-believe. Your beginning commitment must be to expose and accept new realities, regardless how hard or obnoxious the outcomes might be. You can't resolve issues if you don't accept that they are there. Once you align yourself with reality, your issues won't repair themselves immediately, but you'll be taking a crucial step in the correct direction.

If you deny your troubles, you reject reality. The lies you tell yourself breed more lies and you get disconnected from your real self, not living up to your potential. You aren't here to live this way. You're here to learn how to produce a life you choose.

For the rest of this book, we'll have a look at reality. This will help you comprehend how to distinguish and accept what's real for you. These ideas may be fairly abstract, so your goal here is merely to acquaint yourself with the concepts.

Law Of Attraction: The Reality Mindset

Achieving A Tranquil State Of Mind With The Principle Of Truth.

Chapter 1:

The Way You See It and Anticipation

Synopsis

The way you see things is the most basic facet of reality. If you wish to improve some piece of your life, you have to consider it first. For instance, if you wish to understand how your relationship is making out, a great place to begin is to ask yourself: How does this relationship make me feel? What pieces are working well? What pieces need improvement? Ask your mate the same questions and compare your replies. Figuring out everyone's point of view will help you determine what changes you'd like to make.

Have A Fresh Look

The way you see things is a key part of personal growth as we respond to what we perceive to be true. Confronting the reality of your situation causes you to spark fresh desires. If you weigh yourself and see that you weigh more than you want, you think, I'd like to slim down. Once you get clear-cut about what you don't wish, you get clear about what you do wish. These fresh desires may help drive you in a favorable new direction, but nothing will change till you first accept that you'd wish it to.

The beginning step on your path of personal growth has to be to acknowledge that how your life is today isn't how you wish it to be. It's all right to want something and have no clue how to acquire it, but it's not all right to lie to yourself and make believe everything is perfect when you recognize it isn't.

It's easy for me to tell you that you ought to face reality, but this may be really hard to do. It's difficult to accept that you've gotten disgruntled with your relationship. It's difficult to admit that you made the incorrect career choice. It's difficult to view yourself in the mirror and see that you don't like the individual you've turned into. But in spite of how hard this is, it's still essential. You can't get to where you want to be if you obstinately refuse to admit what needs to change.

What in your life would you like to change? Look around you and discover what you like and dislike about your life story. Don't fret about setting particular goals yet; simply become mindful of what you perceive and how you respond to it.

Chapter 2:

Anticipation

Synopsis

Anticipation is how you learn from experience and discover what is true. As you notice any new situation or event, one of two things may occur: either the experience will live up to your expectations, or it won't.

Once an experience meets your anticipation, what you believe as reality stays intact. However when an experience violates your anticipation, your mind has to update its belief of reality to fit the fresh info. This is how you learn from experience and expose new realities.

Predict

Your predictive abilities are highly flexible. When you learn something fresh, your brain attempts to generalize from the experience. It likes generalities rather than particular details. Your power to remember the details will be blurry, but you'll commonly have a firm recollection of patterns. For instance, you are able to comprehend written communication, but you don't remember when and where you learned every word. You recognize what particular foods taste like, but you don't recall each meal.

Your brain mechanically makes anticipations about the future, even when you aren't mindful of it. When you view an object on a shelf, your brain can anticipate that it will be a book when you pick it up. You anticipate the book will have a particular weight, texture, and look. As long as your expectations are fulfilled, the mental pattern stays intact.

Your brain continually generalizes from your particular experiences, stashes away those general patterns, and then utilizes them to anticipate the result of new events. This occurs mechanically, commonly without you knowing. But, when you become aware that this is how your brain behaves, you can intentionally take your brain to a whole new plane.

There are 2 potent ways you can utilize your brains anticipatory powers to speed up your personal growth. First, by accepting fresh experiences that are different than anything you've previously ran into, you'll literally become more levelheaded. Fresh situations switch your brain into learning mode, which enables you to expose fresh patterns. The more patterns your brain memorizes, the better it becomes at anticipation, and the brighter you become.

Study a book on a subject that's totally foreign to you. Speak to individuals you'd generally avoid. Travel to an unfamiliar city. Reach beyond the patterns your brain has already memorized. In order to grow, you have to repeatedly take on new challenges and Think about fresh ideas. If you simply repeat the same things, your learning ability will wither.

What you discover in one situation may frequently be applied to others. By exposing yourself to a rich assortment of input, you'll find patterns that you never noticed. This immensely amplifies your problem-solving powers.

What's regarded old-hat in one field often has originative applications in other fields. Exposing yourself to the same sorts of stimulus again and again won't help you grow. You'll simply fulfill your brains expectations rather than pushing it to build fresh patterns.

If you wish to get smarter, you have to continue stirring things up. Set up basic routines simply to supply a stable basis for diversifying. Press yourself to do things you've never accomplished before. Continue exposing yourself to fresh things, ideas, and stimulation.

The 2nd way to apply your brains anticipatory powers is to make conscious, calculated predictions and utilize those predictions to make more beneficial choices. Consider where you're going and ask yourself: How do I realistically expect my life to wind up? Envisage your life in twenty years, based on your current behavior patterns. What sort of future will you have?

If you're courageous enough, ask numerous individuals who know you well to provide a truthful judgment of where they see you in 20 years. Their replies might surprise you. Once you become mindful of your brains long-run expectations, you stare reality right in the eye. This gives you the opportunity to reinforce your positive predictions and to bring on shifts to prevent negative expectations.

Your emotions are component of your brains anticipatory output. Favorable feelings come from favorable anticipations, and damaging feelings come from damaging ones.

When you feel great, your brain is expecting a favorable outcome. When you feel foul, your brain anticipates an unfavorable result. Damaging emotions function as a warning that you have to alter your behavior today in order to prevent unwanted results.

Heed to your realistic expectations. Don't battle with them or attempt to refuse them. Learn to live with your expectations and work with them.

Once you see that you're predicting a negative result, look into those feelings to determine the cause, and continue making changes till your expectations shift. When you reveal favorable expectations, observe what's working for you and continue doing more of it.

Chapter 3:

Correct Judgments and Accepting

Synopsis

The more your inner reality matches true reality, the better you can make things. With precision you're more likely to make good decisions that will move you in the direction you want. With inaccuracy, you're more expected to experience setbacks and defeat.

Absolute clarity is rare. When you go after a specific career, you'll never know if another one may have turned out better. If you're in a relationship, you can never be sure that a better mate isn't out there.

If you arrive at one decision, you'll never know what would have occurred if you made a different selection. You can attempt to be as clear as possible about a situation, and that's usually a great idea, but you may never get rid of all doubt.

Own Up

So you've 2 primary choices: deny the volatility of life and have a false sense of security, or learn to live with the issues of life. In the 1st example, you're making reality the way you wish it to be, no matter what the real circumstances. In the 2nd example, you're trying to make things as precise as possible, even though you might not like it. The 2nd choice is more beneficial.

When you live with the innate uncertainty of life, your choices will be more accurate. You'll find it simpler to avoid errors. You don't have to be scared of the uncertainty of life. You have to intelligently manage risks rather than ignoring they exist.

A different issue is that your predictions may be wrong. Some wrong notions will self-correct as you acquire more experience, but many times those mistakes may worsen and self-reinforce. Here are a few instances of how your mind's anticipatory powers may fail you:

Over generalizing: If you've a few bad dating experiences your brain learns the formula that dating is unsatisfying. Therefore, you avoid going on any more dates as you see it as something bad. Regrettably, this means you'll never find a favorable dating experience, which would've let your brain correct this notion. Previous patterns hold on as long as there's no new input.

Setting up failure. Some of your acquaintances attempt to begin their own net businesses, however they all fail and finally quit. From their model, your brain learns that beginning a net business is hard and will probably lead to failure. A while later you decide to launch your own net endeavor. You subconsciously undermine yourself by making avoidable errors, and finally you quit, just as your acquaintances did.

These nasty patterns share a basic factor: their predictions are excessively pessimistic. However, being too optimistic can be even as problematic. The better predictions are the most precise ones. When you've discovered what's true for you with a fair degree of accuracy, your following job is to totally and completely accept the reality.

Think about your body. Is it fit, healthy, and strong? Or is it unhealthy, flabby, and feeble? What do you anticipate will occur if you go forward with your current health habits? Do you admit the reality of where you'll probably wind up? Are you willing to accept those consequences?

What about your financial health? Are you in a place where you'll never want for anything? Or are you going to be broke? What do you truthfully expect to occur if your present financial patterns carry on?

Naturally there's enormous uncertainty in attempting to anticipate where your life story is headed, but you can still aspire for the most sensible, rational expectation founded on the available evidence. If you look at somebody else's life that shares the same qualities as you and you had to guess the outcome, what would you see?

If you face objectionable realities, you'll frequently encounter firm inner opposition. This opposition presses you to avoid facing the reality with distraction, escapism, denial, and putting things off. Only by facing these realities can you find the strength to handle them consciously. A simple guideline is this: whatever you dread, you have to eventually confront. If you're confronted with a reality you don't like, and you feel you can't alter it, the opening move is to admit the reality of your situation. Say to yourself: This situation is bad for me; all the same I lack the power to alter it today.

Openly accept that even though you have utter responsibility for each area of your life, you might not have the power to fix what isn't working at this minute.

Simply admit that this is reality for now, but don't refuse the truth of the situation. Never pretend. If you wish your situation to improve, you have to first be real with yourself and accept the whole truth. When you totally accept reality, you'll start making better choices as they'll be based on reality rather than fiction.

If you accept that your body needs work, you'll quit pretending that you're healthy. You'll quit eating wrong and start exercising. You'll start to see that you've have to begin making different decisions if you wish your situation to shift -it won't occur on its own.

Once you totally surrender to what is, you can ultimately start to create what you wish.

Chapter 4:

Knowing Self

Synopsis

As you endeavor to bring more reality into your life, you have to cultivate an elevated degree of self-awareness. This includes becoming cognizant of your strong points, failings, gifts, knowledge, prejudices, attachments, wants, emotions, instincts, habits, and frame of mind.

Awareness

As humans, we're frequently filled up with contradictory desires. One piece of us wishes to be fit, happy, and extremely conscious. A different piece wishes nothing more than to eat, rest, have sex, and sit around.

Without the presence of awareness, we fall into reflex formulas by default, living more like unconscious beasts than totally capable humans.

Realize that your basic awareness doesn't stay constant.

Occasionally pure logic commands your thinking; other times you're flooded with emotional fears. Occasionally you feel unbelievably spiritual; other times you're concerned about your funds.

Occasionally you eat for wellness and energy; other times you fill yourself with all the processed junk food you are able to consume. When you arrive at choices from a particular frame of mind and act on them, you reinforce that same thing, thereby increasing the odds that you'll react similarly later.

For instance, if you respond out of anger, you'll fortify your brains anger reaction. If you respond out of forgivingness, you'll reinforce a merciful reaction. Any established level of awareness has a tendency to repeat itself, so you'll likely discover yourself going through the same ones over and over.

A substantial portion of personal development demands working to relinquish your attachment to the preprogrammed responses as you pull yourself into higher awareness on a more consistent basis. Practically, this implies relinquishing dependencies, damaging emotions and fear-based behaviors and substituting them with consciously selected, rationally-centered actions. And in order to successfully alter your behaviors, you have to first formulate an awareness of your ideas.

A great way to build up your awareness is to make your crucial choices from the most sensible thinking you are able to summon. The best time to make new selections is when you feel awake, clear-thinking, and levelheaded. That's the time to think about making large shifts in your life like a job change, a relationship change, or relocating to a new city.

Learn to trust those elevated states of consciousness. Put the choices in writing and totally dedicate yourself to them. When you unavoidably sink back down below this elevated state and lose sight of that beneficial perspective, go forward to act on those choices even though you might no longer feel as dedicated to them. Over time, your outside conditions will shift in ways that reinforce those new ways of thinking.

Living consciously becomes simpler with practice.

Once when I was in a state of really elevated awareness, I made the decision to shift careers from direct sales to personal growth. That was a reach for me, particularly as my sales business was working fine, and I still had many big projects in the works. All the same, I felt great about the decision, and I acknowledged it was right.

But naturally a couple of weeks later, I was still going crazy working on the sales business with no end in view. As I slid into less awareness, I started to second-guess my conclusion to shift careers. I had to remind myself that I'd made the selection from an elevated level of awareness; and it was a good, healthy decision.

This helped me relinquish my resistance and trust the original selection I'd arrived at.

My choices might not be perfect, but when I utilize this process, I may at least trust that I made them properly and from a place of reality. When you consistently make key choices from an elevated level of awareness, they'll stop shifting back and forth between options.

Realize that when you arrive at choices from a place of rage, concern, sorrow, or guilt, you can't see the reality because your predictions will be negatively slanted.

Self-awareness is truly reality-awareness. When your awareness is elevated, you're closer to reality than when your awareness is low. If you can't see reality, your choices will produce substandard results. Decisions from reality are more exact and will tend to afford better consequences than those made from not being aware. The key is to utilize your self-awareness to recognize when you're looking at reality and when you aren't, and strive to make your crucial decisions only when this principle is working for you.

Wrapping Up

The importance of living truth can't be over-stated. It's extraordinary how much we lie. Being truthful and displaying honesty is something that we for some reason hold as scary. We lie to other people and to ourselves.

We don't always plan this but if you looked into and watched yourself you'll see you hardly ever tell it like it is for you.

How come you're afraid to let other people know what is there for you? Why is it chilling to admit, even to yourself, the reality of your experience? We hold it that a few things are acceptable and a few are not. We split the world into 2 parts and are all right about disclosing an idea, emotion, notion or want that we're reasonably confident will be agreed with or acceptable.

All the same, when it comes to being truthful about something that's in our experience that might bring shame or isolation, we quickly make that not all right.

All this to continue the character and image you mistakenly believe you are and above all keep that image loved or attempt to ensure you're loved.

You learned to withhold honesty and it preserves today. The importance of being truthful isn't obvious. What do you believe that does to your sense of self and being all right knowing at heart that you have to lie?

However, being truthful and telling the truth as much as possible, regardless the irritation or how it makes you temporarily feel, will begin transforming your life quickly. Then whenever you're not truthful you'll remember the importance of being realistic.
